HARD CHOICES IN HEALTH CARE

HARD CHOICES IN HEALTHCARE

Edited by Jo Lenaghan

With the current debate over the gap between supply and demand in health care often conflicting with rising patient expectations, policy makers and health care workers have found it increasingly difficult to reconcile these two factors.

HARD CHOICES IN HEALTH CARE attempts to offer a solution to this problem, with a series of essays commissioned by the Institute of Public Policy Research which consider the need to ration, as well as the desire to uphold and increase the rights of patients.

- Experts from seven European countries address:
- fundamental issues such as equity, rights and social solidarity
- case studies from Spain, Sweden, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, France and the UK
- health care rights and rationing throughout Europe

This book provides essential reading for all those interested in exploring how the rights of patients can be guaranteed in an era of change and uncertainty.

Making Sense OF HEALTH CARE

SENSE AND SENSIBILITY IN HEALTH CARE

Edited by Marshall Marinker

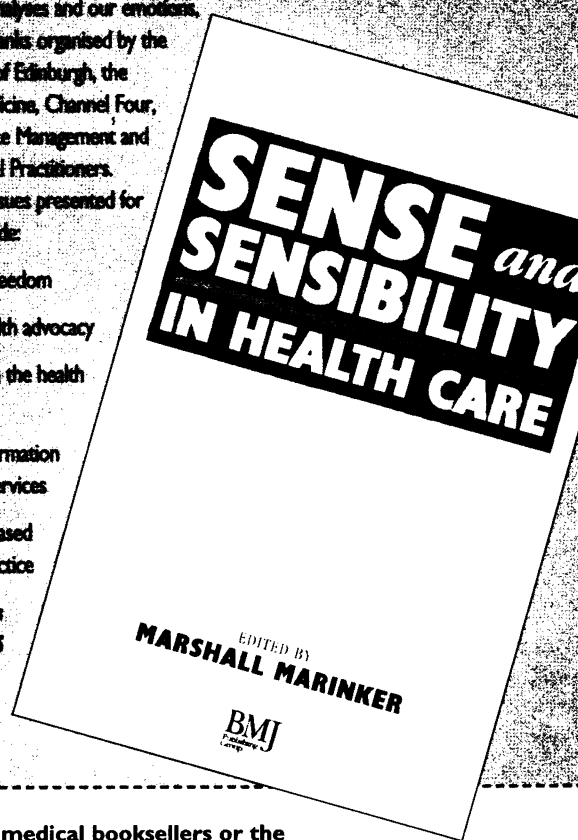

Sense and Sensibility in Health Care discusses some of the deeper issues that colour the way health care professionals, managers, patients and the public view the National Health Service.

Exploring the interplay between scientific evidence, economic constraints, our analyses and our emotions, the book is based on think tanks organised by the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, the Faculty of Public Health Medicine, Channel Four, the Institute of Health Service Management and the Royal College of General Practitioners.

Some of the controversial issues presented for wider public discussion include:

- the bounds of clinical freedom
- the future of public health advocacy
- the role of the media in the health policy debate
- the likely impact of information technology on health services
- the limits of evidence-based medicine in general practice
